

THE CLIMAX.

WEDNESDAY, - - MARCH 11, 1896

—Yesterday was a "bute" for March!

—Richmond has thirty-two groceries.

—Dr. Landman, Optician, at Glyndon.

—See Todd's big dry goods advertisement.

—Hon. E. W. Pryse, of Beattyville, died Sunday.

—Mrs. Edna Bowman has been ill for several weeks.

—White & Gibson's store has a new floor, the first in 85 years.

—Seven centuries of English song, at the court house, Friday night.

—J. H. Boggs has 20 bushels of potatoes and their seeds for sale.

—Cint Todd stabbed his son to death in Rockcastle county, Tuesday night.

—Henry Klein and son are receiving a full line of millinery. Latest styles.

—Our Kentucky news columns on the fourth page are usually good this week.

—F. M. Gibson, late of Fort Estill, is night operator at K. C. Depot in Richmond.

—Longfellow, the celebrated Jemmett Jack, is offered for sale by Maj. Harris, See ad.

—Preaching Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock at Mt. Pleasant Church, by Elder W. S. Stanhope.

—Dr. Fred Smith has returned from Louisville and is now with Dr. W. W. Hargis on Second street.

—Bill Bennett colored, was brought back last week, having escaped from the chain gang a year or so ago.

—The free turnpike petition to the county Judge will require seven hundred and fifty names of voters.

—S. B. White has received six hens and a roster of the buffloghorn variety, the first and only ones in the county.

—George Tatum, of Millon precinct, died at the Infirmary in Richmond, Tuesday night, of Bright's disease, aged 42 years.

D. M. Bright, the well-known retired merchant, is sick and contends that he is seriously afflicted, but his physician says not.

—James Taylor applied to the county Judge Monday for license to sell whisky at mouth of Buffalo Fork of Tates Creek, but was refused.

—Ex-Governor David Rowland Francis was elected permanent chairman of the Missouri sound money conference at St. Louis, March 4th.

—Mr. McNew, of Rockcastle county, who was injured in an accident, last November, has been brought to the Infirmary for treatment.

David Powers, of Richmond, has purchased the saloon of Leslie Pigg on the corner of Washington and Maple streets, Winchester Democrat.

—The old drug firm of Powers & Hagan is after those who owe them, and have a notice elsewhere in to-day's CLIMAX bristling with daggers.

—Louis H. Landman, oculist and optician, of No. 411 W. 9th street, Cincinnati, O., will be at the Glyndon Hotel in Winchester, March 11, '96.

—Deputy Circuit Clerk John Thorpe has bought T. A. Chennault's interest in the lively stable near the opera house and the firm is Duncan & Thorpe.

—The services at Episcopal Church, this town, interrupted by the illness of the clergyman in charge, will be resumed on Sunday next at the usual hour, 11 a. m.

—T. H. Hart is forming local clubs of the American Musical Association, of Chicago, whereby members pay eighty per cent. of the usual price of sheet music.

—O. Louis C. Elson, who will lecture at the Court House, this place, Friday night, the Courier Journal, says: "He is the foremost critic the East can produce today."

—Mrs. Thomas Hart and daughters have removed to Covington where they will reside for the present, after making Richmond their home for ten or a dozen years.

—Dr. A. W. Smith, has been paid $5,080, the amount of a 20-year policy in the Mutual Benefit Life Ins. Co., of Newark, N. J., which policy was taken out on 4th of March, 1876.

—W. B. Million Randolph, Illinois writing to have his CLIMAX changed from Shirley, mentions that on the 6th, he killed a rattlesnake 34 feet long with 15 rattles and a tuftion.

—J. T. Parrish of Madison county, who bought Dr. Stuart's place, will take possession in a few days. He is a spinster and we gladly welcome him to our county. —Winchester Democrat.

—You who favor free turnpikes must decide whether you want bonds issued by the county to purchase and maintain the pikes, or whether you will pay a tax each year, according to amount required.

—In mentioning the deaths last week of Mrs. Mary Park and Mrs. Elizabeth Keller in Missouri, we got the places transposed, saying that the former died at Butler and the latter at Liberty, when it was just the opposite.

—Mrs. Charles McCann has brought suit against the Louisville & Nashville for $10,000 for the death of her husband, which was caused by injuries received in getting off the train at Talbot's station.

—Paris Kentucky-Citizen.

New Trip in Town.

His name is John Browning Terrell, and he arrived at Chief of Police Torrell's, last Friday. His weight is 11 pounds, and is named for his paternal great grandfather.

Seven Centuries of English Song.

This is the subject of a lecture at the court house, Friday night, by Lewis C. Elson, under the auspices of Madison Institute. Can you imagine a song seven centuries old? Go and hear all about it.

Dead.

R. T. Baxter, familiarly known as Bud, died on Thursday, March 5th, 1896, in Richmond, of consumption after a lingering illness. Buried in the cemetery on Friday. He was a son of the late Homer Baxter, and leaves a wife and three sons.

Jerseys Sold.

Capt. S. B. White has sold to F. J. Dickinson a cow at $80, to George D. White two at $120, to A. J. C. Powell five, one at $75. All A. J. C. cows registered. They are beautiful.

PERSONALS.

If Socrates Marple was ever sheriff of Madison county, we can't recall it. The Register possibly referred to your uncle Sock Parrish.

Secured A Horse.

Dr. Jasper has rented of F. B. Carr the latter's residence on Broadway, and will take possession within the next few days. Mrs. Jasper's mother is coming to live with her.

Free Turnpike Law.

Elsewhere in to-day's CLIMAX is published in full the law just enacted by the Legislature giving the voters of each county a chance to say at the polls whether or not they want free pikes. Read it and see how you like it.

Meat.

C. T. Wells has sold a half interest in his meat shop to A. T. Douglas, late with J. C. Miller, and the new firm is Wells & Douglas.

Map Money.

Madison Institute's primary department gave an entertainment, Thursday night. The chapel was well filled with parents and friends, and the children acquitted themselves creditably. An admission fee of 15 cents brought in a snug little sum which will be expended for maps and charts for that department.

Todd.

Louis P. Todd has opened his extensive and entirely new stock of dry goods and millinery at his main street stand, opposite the court house. Read his big advertisement in to-day's CLIMAX and then go see his goods. Mr. Todd selects these goods in person, and you can depend on it they are just what you want.

Fair Prices.

At Jacob Hackett's sale, near Red House, Wednesday, the farm of 225 acres went to Squire B. C. Hackett at $33,500 per acre, or $7,512.50. Horses, $200-$300; mules, $300-$700; jacks and jeunets, $100-$200.

Imported.

James Howard Boggs & Co. have received from Stafford, Eng., through Mr. Twigg, the young English farmer of this county, a thoroughbred fox hound stud. She came by way of New York and reached Richmond Monday. Her pedigree is as long as from here to Doyleville by way of Red House, Banker Greenleaf and Col. Caperton have an interest in the importation.

A Genuine Gold Ring.

United States Deputy Marshal Caywood was here Thursday night, on his return from Harlan county. He had in charge Samuel Caldwell, a 400-lb. looking, well-dressed young man, charged with counterfeiting gold coins. He was taken to Covington for trial. Except the glittering hand cuffs, there was nothing to indicate that a bad man was in town.

Through His Hat.

J. D. Dykes is the only known man who really talks through his hat. Manager Baldwin of the telephone company has constructed for him a telephone instrument inside of a big white hat. The hat hangs on a peg on the wall of the grocery, and the only thing to show that it is ready to take down and go on a fellow's head is a crank on one side and a small receiver about the size of a piece of paper on the other.

A Sad Death.

Miss Nannie Harcourt died at her home on Second street in Richmond, Tuesday night, March 3d, 1896, after a brief illness of pneumonia. She was a teacher in Caldwell High School and taught to within three or four weeks of her death. The remains were preceded to the cemetery on Thursday by a long line of pupils escorted by the Principal and other teachers, and followed by numerous friends. Miss Harcourt had taught in the school for eight years and was a devoted favorite. Her parents have long been dead, and the only survivor of the family is Miss Frances Harcourt, her sister. She was a member of the Christian church and was educated at Hamilton College, Lexington.

Killed By the Cars.

Ballard Mullins, of Multis Station, Rockcastle county, broken on the K. C. fell from a north bound freight between Slate Lick and Berea, about 7 o'clock last evening, and was killed. The remains were brought out to Richmond. He was 23 years old and unmarried. Coroner Brown held an inquest. The body was prepared for burial by undertaker Collins and shipped home on the midnight train.

Burned.

Between 4 and 5 o'clock, Sunday morning, the barn of William T. Griggs at Eliston, was burned. It was the massive, old building on stone pillars, that stood immediately by the side of the pike at the east end of the bridge, and was a familiar object to all who have traveled that road. The barn contained three horses, 7,000 new shingles, 100 barrels of corn, a stack of hay, considerable fodder, 150 bushels of chicken feed, 3 saddles, some harness and other things, all of which were a total loss, without insurance. There was a cow in the barn, but she broke out and escaped. One of the horses jumped out of its stall and passed at the door but could not get out. The mill and store-house were close but did not take fire. The origin of the fire is not known, but is believed to have been accidental, as Mr. Griggs does not know of an enemy who would commit such a crime.

Change at the K. C. Depot.

Agent F. B. Carr has been transferred from the Richmond to the Paris K. C. depot. The change will be made this week. Ticket agent J. D. Feely, Jr., will go with him.

Mr. Carr will be succeeded by Mr. Hood, Covington, son of Superintendent Hood. Mr. Feely will be succeeded by James Hamilton, and his place will be supplied by Otto Powers, and Powers, by Joe Tevis.

Mr. Carr came here from Paris ten or twelve years ago, has made the best agent the road ever had at this point, married here, built up a nice home and consequently is loth to leave. He however, besides returning to his old home gets an increased salary.

In this connection mention should be made that A. E. Yelton, who married Miss Grace Millon, granddaughter of William M. Dalton and has been agent at Milldale near Covington, is now in the Paris office.

Near Tampa, Florida, masked men broke open the house of Bowen Lykes, whereupon he killed four of them and wounded seven with a repeating rifle.

WARREN HARRIS.

A Remarkable Man, A Native of Madison County, Passes Away.

The Kansas City Star, of February 28, announces the death of that widely-known former citizen of Madison county, Warren Harris, and gives a lengthy sketch of his life, which is hereunder reproduced. The Star, however, is not advised as to the nonagenarian's career in Madison.

Warren Harris came back to Madison before the close of the war, having been a soldier in General Price's army in Missouri. He was a conspicuous figure in the terrible court house fight on January 13th, 1896, during the Merriam-Balwell contested election, when, whereas Balwell had been seated in the legislature, he was ousted by Merriam, Democrat, in which the Kavanaghs and Dotys on one side were arrayed against the Parrishes, Worrells and others in which he killed Amos Worrell. Henry Parrish and As Doty were killed. Also Arch Kaupin was killed by accident. Humph Kaupin, though was wounded, and was later assassinated by one of the Parrish party as he lay in bed.

Warren Harris knew no such word as fear. He was not fool-hardy; on the contrary, had great discretion; but when nerve was necessary he had it. He was once accosted on the streets of Richmond by a dangerous man who wanted to kill him. Mr. Harris was not afraid, so told the man he had promised his wife never to fight without consulting her, and that he must go get her consent. He went away, the man casting after him some words of derision, and not expecting to see him again. Soon he returned having got his pistol, instead of consulting his wife, and quietly remarked: "Well, yes, yes, Sammie, by G-d, it's all right. She says I can fight." That ended the matter. During the battle of Lexington, Mo., the mules in one of Price's batteries were shot down just as an order was given to advance. Harris was a giant in those days and seizing six pound cannon he dragged it into position and stood to it until the remainder of the fight. In one battle he saw a spent shell fall, he was bouncing across the field and thought he'd catch it. He did catch it in his left arm and nearly lost that arm as a result. He was laid up in the camp hospital for some days. A favorite diversion was to keep the ball in the hot ashes, and when he saw any one coming would roll it out. Soon the conversation would turn to his injuries, when he would turn to the ball and say "if you don't think that thing's hot, let it." The fellow would let go without being told.

While Jailer of Madison county, the Kuklux came for Frank Searcy and ordered Mr. Harris to bring the key to the cell. The jailer went up stairs, the residence then being above the cells in the old jail, and brought the wrong key. The leader of the "klan" tried the key, and then with some hot words said to Harris: "I appoint four men to go up with you, sir, and get the right key; and there is to be no mistake about its being the right one!" Harris, in his quiet and characteristic way replied: "Well, yes, yes, two'll do, two'll do, sir." The key was brought and Searcy was hanged.

Warren Harris could not say "no" directly. It was impossible for him to do so, just as much as it was for Geo. Washington to tell a lie. Two men made a bet on it one day. They sent a poor irresponsible fellow to him to borrow some money. The fellow said: "Uncle Warren, lend me a hundred dollars, I'll hand it back to you in a few days." "Well, yes, yes, I can't do it, my son, I haven't the money just now."

"Once upon a time" as story tellers would say, a party were fox hunting down in the College Hill country. The dogs were trailing beautifully, and Harris was encouraging them with an occasional yell. Suddenly he paused, and pointing to an old dead tree a quarter of a mile away, said: "Boys, do you see that old tree yonder?" "Yes, yes," they shouted, "what about it Uncle Warren?" The old hunter yelled to his dogs again and said: "I was along here the other day, and I saw a big hawk sitting on top of that tree. I jumped up and shot at him, and he picked up a snake, right where we were standing now. I had no idea of hitting the hawk, but—"you hit him, did you, Uncle Warren?" his companions eagerly asked. "Well, yes, yes, no, I missed him, boys, missed him clear," was the unexpected reply.

When Sam Holmes, a wealthy young man of Lincoln county, killed Sheriff Napier, he was brought to Richmond by friends and placed in Harris's care. Harris went West with him, and took pains along the route to tell those who met that he knew where Holmes was and he was going to see that the boundless west didn't harbor him. So he did, for he took Holmes to Galveston, Texas, and shipped him to Europe. But Holmes couldn't stay away. He returned, was tried, sent to the penitentiary and soon died.

Harris was in the attack on John Brown at Ossawatimie, saw Brown's son shot down, and showed the fallen man some kindness, and prevented the murder of several of Brown's men by their captors.

Many readers of THE CLIMAX will recall the unusual privileges allowed Warren Harris, when he was Jailer. He built a little plank stable on the corner of the court house square, or what was then the corner of the jail yard, as a fence separated the jail from the court-house, and stood a stallion in it. He once had a big chicken fight in the ment of the jail, at which from first to last, half the men in town were present. In the spring of 1893, he had a great cocking man in a bar on Second street about two hundred yards beyond where the K. N. & B. crosses that street, and the omnibusmen ran out to it they would to a fair. It lasted a week, and visitors from a distance were numerous.

The Kansas City Star is mistaken as to one point. It says Mr. Harris's mother was the first white child born in Kentucky. She was merely among the first. She was a daughter of Thomas Warren. He and his wife came first to Booneborough, and as soon as Estill's station was built, removed to it, and continued to reside in that vicinity until their deaths.

The Star is also mistaken about Harris being in Virginia at close of war and returning to Platte county. He was here, was elected jailer at August election 1866, served 4 years, resided about 8 years longer and then went West.

The Star which publishes a full length portrait of the deceased, with his great working case five feet high, says:

News has been received here of the death of "Uncle" Warren Harris, one of the landmarks of the Missouri valley for more than half of a century. He was nearly 89 years of age and died at the home of his daughter in Arkansas, during a visit to her. He was an original

WARREN HARRIS.

A Remarkable Man, A Native of Madison County, Passes Away.

The Kansas City Star, of February 28, announces the death of that widely-known former citizen of Madison county, Warren Harris, and gives a lengthy sketch of his life, which is hereunder reproduced. The Star, however, is not advised as to the nonagenarian's career in Madison.

Warren Harris came back to Madison before the close of the war, having been a soldier in General Price's army in Missouri. He was a conspicuous figure in the terrible court house fight on January 13th, 1896, during the Merriam-Balwell contested election, when, whereas Balwell had been seated in the legislature, he was ousted by Merriam, Democrat, in which the Kavanaghs and Dotys on one side were arrayed against the Parrishes, Worrells and others in which he killed Amos Worrell. Henry Parrish and As Doty were killed. Also Arch Kaupin was killed by accident. Humph Kaupin, though was wounded, and was later assassinated by one of the Parrish party as he lay in bed.

Warren Harris knew no such word as fear. He was not fool-hardy; on the contrary, had great discretion; but when nerve was necessary he had it. He was once accosted on the streets of Richmond by a dangerous man who wanted to kill him. Mr. Harris was not afraid, so told the man he had promised his wife never to fight without consulting her, and that he must go get her consent. He went away, the man casting after him some words of derision, and not expecting to see him again. Soon he returned having got his pistol, instead of consulting his wife, and quietly remarked: "Well, yes, yes, Sammie, by G-d, it's all right. She says I can fight." That ended the matter. During the battle of Lexington, Mo., the mules in one of Price's batteries were shot down just as an order was given to advance. Harris was a giant in those days and seizing six pound cannon he dragged it into position and stood to it until the remainder of the fight. In one battle he saw a spent shell fall, he was bouncing across the field and thought he'd catch it. He did catch it in his left arm and nearly lost that arm as a result. He was laid up in the camp hospital for some days. A favorite diversion was to keep the ball in the hot ashes, and when he saw any one coming would roll it out. Soon the conversation would turn to his injuries, when he would turn to the ball and say "if you don't think that thing's hot, let it." The fellow would let go without being told.

While Jailer of Madison county, the Kuklux came for Frank Searcy and ordered Mr. Harris to bring the key to the cell. The jailer went up stairs, the residence then being above the cells in the old jail, and brought the wrong key. The leader of the "klan" tried the key, and then with some hot words said to Harris: "I appoint four men to go up with you, sir, and get the right key; and there is to be no mistake about its being the right one!" Harris, in his quiet and characteristic way replied: "Well, yes, yes, two'll do, two'll do, sir." The key was brought and Searcy was hanged.

Warren Harris could not say "no" directly. It was impossible for him to do so, just as much as it was for Geo. Washington to tell a lie. Two men made a bet on it one day. They sent a poor irresponsible fellow to him to borrow some money. The fellow said: "Uncle Warren, lend me a hundred dollars, I'll hand it back to you in a few days." "Well, yes, yes, I can't do it, my son, I haven't the money just now."

"Once upon a time" as story tellers would say, a party were fox hunting down in the College Hill country. The dogs were trailing beautifully, and Harris was encouraging them with an occasional yell. Suddenly he paused, and pointing to an old dead tree a quarter of a mile away, said: "Boys, do you see that old tree yonder?" "Yes, yes," they shouted, "what about it Uncle Warren?" The old hunter yelled to his dogs again and said: "I was along here the other day, and I saw a big hawk sitting on top of that tree. I jumped up and shot at him, and he picked up a snake, right where we were standing now. I had no idea of hitting the hawk, but—"you hit him, did you, Uncle Warren?" his companions eagerly asked. "Well, yes, yes, no, I missed him, boys, missed him clear," was the unexpected reply.

When Sam Holmes, a wealthy young man of Lincoln county, killed Sheriff Napier, he was brought to Richmond by friends and placed in Harris's care. Harris went West with him, and took pains along the route to tell those who met that he knew where Holmes was and he was going to see that the boundless west didn't harbor him. So he did, for he took Holmes to Galveston, Texas, and shipped him to Europe. But Holmes couldn't stay away. He returned, was tried, sent to the penitentiary and soon died.

Harris was in the attack on John Brown at Ossawatimie, saw Brown's son shot down, and showed the fallen man some kindness, and prevented the murder of several of Brown's men by their captors.

Many readers of THE CLIMAX will recall the unusual privileges allowed Warren Harris, when he was Jailer. He built a little plank stable on the corner of the court house square, or what was then the corner of the jail yard, as a fence separated the jail from the court-house, and stood a stallion in it. He once had a big chicken fight in the ment of the jail, at which from first to last, half the men in town were present. In the spring of 1893, he had a great cocking man in a bar on Second street about two hundred yards beyond where the K. N. & B. crosses that street, and the omnibusmen ran out to it they would to a fair. It lasted a week, and visitors from a distance were numerous.

The Kansas City Star is mistaken as to one point. It says Mr. Harris's mother was the first white child born in Kentucky. She was merely among the first. She was a daughter of Thomas Warren. He and his wife came first to Booneborough, and as soon as Estill's station was built, removed to it, and continued to reside in that vicinity until their deaths.

The Star is also mistaken about Harris being in Virginia at close of war and returning to Platte county. He was here, was elected jailer at August election 1866, served 4 years, resided about 8 years longer and then went West.

The Star which publishes a full length portrait of the deceased, with his great working case five feet high, says:

News has been received here of the death of "Uncle" Warren Harris, one of the landmarks of the Missouri valley for more than half of a century. He was nearly 89 years of age and died at the home of his daughter in Arkansas, during a visit to her. He was an original

WARREN HARRIS.

A Remarkable Man, A Native of Madison County, Passes Away.

The Kansas City Star, of February 28, announces the death of that widely-known former citizen of Madison county, Warren Harris, and gives a lengthy sketch of his life, which is hereunder reproduced. The Star, however, is not advised as to the nonagenarian's career in Madison.

Warren Harris came back to Madison before the close of the war, having been a soldier in General Price's army in Missouri. He was a conspicuous figure in the terrible court house fight on January 13th, 1896, during the Merriam-Balwell contested election, when, whereas Balwell had been seated in the legislature, he was ousted by Merriam, Democrat, in which the Kavanaghs and Dotys on one side were arrayed against the Parrishes, Worrells and others in which he killed Amos Worrell. Henry Parrish and As Doty were killed. Also Arch Kaupin was killed by accident. Humph Kaupin, though was wounded, and was later assassinated by one of the Parrish party as he lay in bed.

Warren Harris knew no such word as fear. He was not fool-hardy; on the contrary, had great discretion; but when nerve was necessary he had it. He was once accosted on the streets of Richmond by a dangerous man who wanted to kill him. Mr. Harris was not afraid, so told the man he had promised his wife never to fight without consulting her, and that he must go get her consent. He went away, the man casting after him some words of derision, and not expecting to see him again. Soon he returned having got his pistol, instead of consulting his wife, and quietly remarked: "Well, yes, yes, Sammie, by G-d, it's all right. She says I can fight." That ended the matter. During the battle of Lexington, Mo., the mules in one of Price's batteries were shot down just as an order was given to advance. Harris was a giant in those days and seizing six pound cannon he dragged it into position and stood to it until the remainder of the fight. In one battle he saw a spent shell fall, he was bouncing across the field and thought he'd catch it. He did catch it in his left arm and nearly lost that arm as a result. He was laid up in the camp hospital for some days. A favorite diversion was to keep the ball in the hot ashes, and when he saw any one coming would roll it out. Soon the conversation would turn to his injuries, when he would turn to the ball and say "if you don't think that thing's hot, let it." The fellow would let go without being told.

While Jailer of Madison county, the Kuklux came for Frank Searcy and ordered Mr. Harris to bring the key to the cell. The jailer went up stairs, the residence then being above the cells in the old jail, and brought the wrong key. The leader of the "klan" tried the key, and then with some hot words said to Harris: "I appoint four men to go up with you, sir, and get the right key; and there is to be no mistake about its being the right one!" Harris, in his quiet and characteristic way replied: "Well, yes, yes, two'll do, two'll do, sir." The key was brought and Searcy was hanged.

Warren Harris could not say "no" directly. It was impossible for him to do so, just as much as it was for Geo. Washington to tell a lie. Two men made a bet on it one day. They sent a poor irresponsible fellow to him to borrow some money. The fellow said: "Uncle Warren, lend me a hundred dollars, I'll hand it back to you in a few days." "Well, yes, yes, I can't do it, my son, I haven't the money just now."

"Once upon a time" as story tellers would say, a party were fox hunting down in the College Hill country. The dogs were trailing beautifully, and Harris was encouraging them with an occasional yell. Suddenly he paused, and pointing to an old dead tree a quarter of a mile away, said: "Boys, do you see that old tree yonder?" "Yes, yes," they shouted, "what about it Uncle Warren?" The old hunter yelled to his dogs again and said: "I was along here the other day, and I saw a big hawk sitting on top of that tree. I jumped up and shot at him, and he picked up a snake, right where we were standing now. I had no idea of hitting the hawk, but—"you hit him, did you, Uncle Warren?" his companions eagerly asked. "Well, yes, yes, no, I missed him, boys, missed him clear," was the unexpected reply.

When Sam Holmes, a wealthy young man of Lincoln county, killed Sheriff Napier, he was brought to Richmond by friends and placed in Harris's care. Harris went West with him, and took pains along the route to tell those who met that he knew where Holmes was and he was going to see that the boundless west didn't harbor him. So he did, for he took Holmes to Galveston, Texas, and shipped him to Europe. But Holmes couldn't stay away. He returned, was tried, sent to the penitentiary and soon died.

Harris was in the attack on John Brown at Ossawatimie, saw Brown's son shot down, and showed the fallen man some kindness, and prevented the murder of several of Brown's men by their captors.

Many readers of THE CLIMAX will recall the unusual privileges allowed Warren Harris, when he was Jailer. He built a little plank stable on the corner of the court house square, or what was then the corner of the jail yard, as a fence separated the jail from the court-house, and stood a stallion in it. He once had a big chicken fight in the ment of the jail, at which from first to last, half the men in town were present. In the spring of 1893, he had a great cocking man in a bar on Second street about two hundred yards beyond where the K. N. & B. crosses that street, and the omnibusmen ran out to it they would to a fair. It lasted a week, and visitors from a distance were numerous.

The Kansas City Star is mistaken as to one point. It says Mr. Harris's mother was the first white child born in Kentucky. She was merely among the first. She was a daughter of Thomas Warren. He and his wife came first to Booneborough, and as soon as Estill's station was built, removed to it, and continued to reside in that vicinity until their deaths.

The Star is also mistaken about Harris being in Virginia at close of war and returning to Platte county. He was here, was elected jailer at August election 1866, served 4 years, resided about 8 years longer and then went West.

The Star which publishes a full length portrait of the deceased, with his great working case five feet high, says:

News has been received here of the death of "Uncle" Warren Harris, one of the landmarks of the Missouri valley for more than half of a century. He was nearly 89 years of age and died at the home of his daughter in Arkansas, during a visit to her. He was an original

WARREN HARRIS.

A Remarkable Man, A Native of Madison County, Passes Away.

The Kansas City Star, of February 28, announces the death of that widely-known former citizen of Madison county, Warren Harris, and gives a lengthy sketch of his life, which is hereunder reproduced. The Star, however, is not advised as to the nonagenarian's career in Madison.

Warren Harris came back to Madison before the close of the war, having been a soldier in General Price's army in Missouri. He was a conspicuous figure in the terrible court house fight on January 13th, 1896, during the Merriam-Balwell contested election, when, whereas Balwell had been seated in the legislature, he was ousted by Merriam, Democrat, in which the Kavanaghs and Dotys on one side were arrayed against the Parrishes, Worrells and others in which he killed Amos Worrell. Henry Parrish and As Doty were killed. Also Arch Kaupin was killed by accident. Humph Kaupin, though was wounded, and was later assassinated by one of the Parrish party as he lay in bed.

Warren Harris knew no such word as fear. He was not fool-hardy; on the contrary, had great discretion; but when nerve was necessary he had it. He was once accosted on the streets of Richmond by a dangerous man who wanted to kill him. Mr. Harris was not afraid, so told the man he had promised his wife never to fight without consulting her, and that he must go get her consent. He went away, the man casting after him some words of derision, and not expecting to see him again. Soon he returned having got his pistol, instead of consulting his wife, and quietly remarked: "Well, yes, yes, Sammie, by G-d, it's all right. She says I can fight." That ended the matter. During the battle of Lexington, Mo., the mules in one of Price's batteries were shot down just as an order was given to advance. Harris was a giant in those days and seizing

